| Activity Two - Decolonize the Narrative | What is Embodied Memory? "For thousands of years, indigenous people have told and retold stories through oral traditions (chants, stories, sounds) and embodied physical movements (dance). Despite colonization and marginalization of indigenous people within their nations, these traditional practices have served and continue to serve as vehicles for transmitting genealogical and cultural knowledge. It is because of these oral traditions that indigenous people are able to perpetuate and promote their cultural practices and language." | Quote | —Kim-Hee Wong, Oral Historian, Columbia Center for Oral History Research |

| Lesson 4 Liberated Territory The Work of Haile Gerima | “Often we are made to disconnect our nerve endings, our antennas, meaning in spiritual terms, and therefore miss out on all kinds of possible communications with our past ancestors. We’re not listening to the bones from the past that are trying to talk to us, even if they traveled like an arrow and tried to jar open our spiritual memory. I think the one thing that this film project enlightened me on is one's ability to recall past ancestors. That is, even for simple and daily invocation, in order to say thank you. This is a very important philosophical principle of the ancestral referential way of co-existence, not only for Black people but for the world. I grew up with these invocations. My mother never ate anything without invoking, without saying thank you, and she’s even Catholic on top of that. She always said thank you as she threw some of the food around for the ancestors to eat also. Even on a personal level, my journey to give birth to the film story of SANKOFA has connected me. In spiritual terms, where I was disconnected, it has made me more centered and partially fulfilled.” | Quote | Haile Gerima |
